The United Nations General Assembly (GA) was established in 1945 by the Charter of the United Nations. Each member state has a permanent seat on this committee. Thus the GA is the congress or parliament of the United Nations. It “occupies a central position as the chief deliberative, policy-making and representative organ of the United Nations.”

In the GA, each UN member state has one vote. No matter how different in military and economic power, all are equal. Thus the United States’ vote counts the same as Egypt’s, and Bolivia has the same voice as China. This is opposed to some UN committees, such as the Security Council, which have limited membership or special voting rules. This feature gives the General Assembly a great deal of legitimacy on the world stage. It is a place where world public opinion can be expressed.

The GA covers all issues of global importance. Article 14 of the United Nations Charter gives the GA the power to “recommend measures for the peaceable adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations.” According to the Charter, the GA “may discuss any questions or any matters within the scope of the present Charter or relating to the powers and functions of any organs” except “any matters relative to the maintenance of international peace and security which are being dealt with by the Security Council.”

The majority of GA resolutions originate in one of the GA’s many subcommittees, such as GA-1 (disarmament and security), GA-2 (economic and financial), GA-3 (social, humanitarian, and cultural), and ECOSOC (economic and social). Thus, the relationship between the GA and its subcommittees is akin to that between the US Senate and its subcommittees. Resolutions passed by subcommittees are simply working papers. Only when the GA passes a resolution does it go into effect.

Resolutions passed by the GA are recommendations to Member States. Unlike Security Council resolutions, they are not binding. Nevertheless, GA resolutions are an expression of world public opinion. Moreover, they often inspire treaties and conventions that are binding on the states that sign them.

---

1 This background guide was written by Karen Ruth Adams, Montana Model UN faculty advisor, with contributions from Kelsi N. Steele (2009), Kedra Hildebrand (2009), Samantha Stephens (2010), Lindsay Benov (2011) and Nicholas Potratz (2014). Copyright 2014 by Karen Ruth Adams.

The GA-3 is a forum for UN Member States to discuss social, humanitarian, and cultural issues, especially those related to human rights. Like the other main committees of the GA, the GA-3 was established in 1947. The GA-3 meets each fall at UN headquarters in New York, as well as in special sessions as deemed necessary.

Because social, humanitarian, and cultural issues have traditionally fallen within the domestic jurisdiction of states, GA-3 debates can be very contentious. Whether human rights are universal and when, where, and how they should be enforced, remain open questions.

Membership, Voting and Leadership

The membership of the GA-3 includes all 193 UN Member States. In addition, non-member states and other entities recognized by the UN as permanent observers may attend and participate in meetings, but they cannot vote. At present, permanent observers include Palestine and the Holy See (Vatican City), as well as a number of international organizations, such as the European Union and African Union.

Each UN member state has one vote on matters before the GA-3. Resolutions and reports pass the committee and go on for General Assembly consideration if approved by a majority of member states. According to the official GA website, “in recent years, a special effort has been made to achieve consensus on issues, rather than deciding by a formal vote, thus strengthening support for the Assembly’s decisions.” When the Chair determines that a consensus exists, a vote is taken by acclamation. Contentious issues are voted on in the traditional manner of in favor, in opposition, and in abstention.

Regional blocs and other alliances play an important role in building consensus. Blocs consist of both countries in the same region and countries from different regions that have similar concerns. For example, the Group of 77 is a group of less-developed countries that often vote together.

The Chair of the GA-3 chairs the meetings and corrects any procedural mistakes. The chairs of the GA-3 and the other five main GA committees are elected annually by the members of their committees, with one chair from each world region. Elections are held at least three months before the beginning of the annual session. The other officers of the GA-3 (three vice chairs and a rapporteur) are elected at the beginning of each annual session.

---

History and Challenges

In 1945, the founding members of the UN expressed their goals for the organization in Article I of the UN Charter. The third of these goals is:

To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.\textsuperscript{13}

The GA-3 and its subsidiary body, the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), take the lead in drafting general resolutions on the social, humanitarian, and cultural matters (economic issues are referred to the GA-2). According to the GA-3 website, social, humanitarian, and cultural issues include:

- the advancement of women, the protection of children, indigenous issues, the treatment of refugees, the promotion of fundamental freedoms through the elimination of racism and racial discrimination, and the right to self-determination. The Committee also addresses important social development questions such as issues related to youth, family, ageing, persons with disabilities, crime prevention, criminal justice, and international drug control.\textsuperscript{14}

The GA-3 also works with the Human Rights Council (HRC) to address the human rights situation in particular UN member states. Specifically, the HRC reports to the GA-3 on specific human rights situations and its recommendations and resolutions for dealing with them. In October 2013, the GA-3 received 49 such briefings.\textsuperscript{15} The GA-3 then discusses the HRC’s recommendations and usually endorses them.

In considering human rights in general and in specific countries, the GA-3 is guided by the General Assembly’s 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), which articulates civil and political rights such as the right to assemble and the right to vote, as well as economic, social, and cultural rights such as the right to work, the right to health, and the right to take part in cultural life and benefit from scientific progress.\textsuperscript{16} The UDHR was primarily drafted in and debated by the GA-3.

According to historian Paul Gordon Lauren, the UDHR was revolutionary because states did “something that had never been done before: create a declaration of universally accepted...standards of human rights...and ... establish...a common standard valid ‘for all peoples and all nations.’” Thus the UDHR is best seen as a hope and a vision for the future, not a statement of the extent to which people enjoy these rights today.\textsuperscript{17}

In 1966, the rights articulated in the UDHR were codified in two international treaties: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,\textsuperscript{18} and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights.\textsuperscript{19} Since then, some states have signed and ratified both covenants, while others have agreed to uphold only one. In

\textsuperscript{15} United Nations, “General Assembly Third Committee.”

Montana Model UN
High School Conference

general, Western bloc states signed the former, while Eastern bloc states signed the latter. Since the end of the Cold War, there has been some crossover among the two. But many debates remain about which of these rights are most important, and why.\(^{20}\)

These debates are at the root of many of the discussion of the GA-3. They are especially contentious, however, when it comes to country-specific matters. When particular states are criticized for failing to uphold certain social, humanitarian, and cultural standards, they and their allies often refuse to cooperate with the committee. Thus the body must be mindful of both the substance and the language of draft resolutions. As explained by Hamid al Bayati of Iraq, GA-3 Chairman during the 61st session (2006), which addressed human rights abuses in Iran, Myanmar, and the Democratic Peoples Republic of Korea:

“We need to put as much pressure as possible on countries to improve human rights conditions, and sometimes we are forced to follow the policy of name and shame…. However, we also don’t want to provoke them unnecessarily or accuse them of false things.”\(^{21}\)

Recent and Current Events

Each year, the GA-3 sends about 50 resolutions to the GA Plenary for final passage. In its 68th Session the GA Plenary passed 68 draft resolutions submitted by the GA-3.\(^{22}\) Of those, more than half address human rights issues, and several address the human rights situation in particular countries.\(^{23}\) During its 68th (2013-2014) session, the GA-3 debated and passed resolutions on crime prevention and criminal justice, freedom of religion or belief, the right to food, racial discrimination, and human trafficking.\(^{24}\)

Country-specific resolutions are often contentious. For example, in 2013, about 70 percent of states in the GA Plenary voted for a GA-3 resolution about human rights in Iran (86 in favor, 36 opposed, and 61 abstentions). Also in 2013, a resolution about rights in the Syria was adopted with a 90 percent majority (127 in favor, 13 opposed, and 47 abstentions).\(^{25}\) Both the fact that consensus was not achieved and the fact that 25 to 33 percent of UN member states abstained from these votes demonstrates that international human rights norms have yet to fully take hold.

In September 2009, Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon congratulated the GA for adopting its first resolution on the international community’s “responsibility to protect” (R2P) civilians from genocide, ethnic cleansing, war crimes, and other atrocities even if this means violating national sovereignty.\(^{26}\) In March 2011, the Security Council

\(^{23}\) United Nations, “General Assembly Third Committee.”

\(^{24}\) For the full text of 2013-2014 GA resolutions related to social, humanitarian, and cultural issues, as well as press releases summarizing their debate, see United Nations General Assembly, “Resolutions, 68th Session,” http://www.un.org/en/ga/68/resolutions.shtml. Resolutions that originated in the GA-3 are indicated in the second column from the left by “C.3.” The fourth column contains links to meeting records.

\(^{25}\) Department of Public Information, “General Assembly Adopts 68 Resolutions.”

acted on this principle when it authorized “all necessary means” to protect civilians in Libya. After that, several members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) assisted Libyan rebels in their fight to depose President Moammar Kadafi. In doing so, they exceeded the Security Council mandate to protect civilians.

Since then, the international consensus behind R2P has weakened, as is evident in the UN’s inability to respond to the civil war in Syria. Although the GA condemned the violence in December 2011, the Security Council has been divided and has done little to protect or aid civilians beyond a resolution to eliminate chemical weapons held by the Syrian government. According to UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, we face an urgent test here and now. Words must become deeds. Promise must become practice. You have all seen the horrible images and reports coming out of Syria: aerial bombardments of civilians; mothers weeping, clutching their dead children in their arms. Inaction cannot be an option for our community of nations. We cannot stand by while populations fall victim to these grave crimes and violations. We must uphold the core responsibilities of the United Nations.

The Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) are the centerpiece of the UN’s campaign to improve worldwide living standards, and are thus a perpetual part of the GA-3 agenda. The MDGs were passed in 2000 by the General Assembly. The goals are to meet the following benchmarks by 2015:

1. Eradicate extreme poverty and hunger
2. Achieve universal primary education
3. Promote gender equality and empower women
4. Reduce child mortality
5. Improve maternal health
6. Combat HIV/AIDS, malaria, and other diseases
7. Ensure environmental sustainability
8. A global partnership for development

Since 2000, the General Assembly has demanded and received annual reports quantifying country and regional progress towards the MDGs. In this way, the GA encourages both short- and long-term progress on the goals. The GA has also repeatedly urged all developed member states to commit to donating 0.7 percent of their country’s gross domestic product toward overseas development assistance. As of August 2014, progress on the 144 regional targets for the eight MDGs was as follows:

-- 47% (68) targets with insufficient progress to meet the reach the 2015 goals if prevailing trends persist
-- 47% (68) targets met or are expected to be met by 2015
-- 4% (6) targets deteriorated or have shown no progress
-- 1% (2) targets missing adequate information.

The focus of international actors has shifted with the 2015 deadline approaching towards “Post-2015,” an as yet undefined set of development goals. On September 25, 2013, GA President of the 68th Session John Ashe held a “Special Event” on the MDGs, at which Member States agreed to work to accelerate progress on the MDGs before the 2015 deadline, and committed to hold a High-Level Summit in 2015 to adopt new goals for the Post-2015 era.

Since then, the Open Working Group on Sustainable Development Goals has released a “Zero Draft” on potential Post-2015 goals. These include 17 goals related to both the old MDGs, such as reducing hunger and poverty, increasing education, and promoting gender equality, as well as new goals relevant the GA-3’s work, such as ensuring sustainable consumption and “access to affordable, reliable reusable and modern energy for all.”

Many lower bodies report to and take direction from the GA-3, including the UN High Commissioner for Refugees and the Human Rights Council. In October 2008, one of the ideas brought to the GA-3 by the Human Rights Council was the “right to development,” which the committee endorsed in a draft resolution.

In November 2011, United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) António Guterres urged the Third Committee to address the forced displacement of people from their homes in response to “population growth, urbanization, climate change and food, water and energy insecurity.” According to Guterres, “displacement patterns [have] changed over the years, and further dramatic changes [are] likely. The world community [needs] to recognize protection gaps … and open the way for innovative approaches to address those gaps.”

According to Guterres, if UN member states do not develop the capacity and will to respond early and effectively to natural disasters, famines, and wars, states in other regions will be vulnerable to the complex humanitarian emergencies recently seen in the Horn of Africa, which he described as “the worst I have seen in my time as High Commissioner.” According to him,

All of us could see this escalation coming from a long way away. Nonetheless, we, the international community, were slow to react to signs that things were starting to deteriorate. What is worse, we also didn’t have the capacity to prevent them from getting this bad in the first place… In such challenging circumstances, we must recognize our shared responsibility. And we must exercise our shared commitment.”38

In 2014, the UNHCR estimated that 6 million persons in the East and Horn of Africa needed humanitarian assistance to avoid illness and death due to lack of food, water, and shelter. Many (about 40%) of those persons were refugees or internally displaced persons from Sudan.39

Agenda Topics for the MMUN Conference

At the 2014 Montana Model United Nations Conference, the General Assembly Third Committee will consider the following topics:

1. International Humanitarian Law
2. The Rights of Indigenous People

When writing your position papers and resolutions, think broadly about these issues, remembering both the overarching goals of the United Nations General Assembly, the human rights stated in the UDHR and other resolutions and covenants, and the perspective of the country you represent.

Recommended Reading

This is a scholarly critique of the Millennium Development Goals from the perspective of less-developed countries.

The “Strengthening of the UN” sections of this report by the former secretary general summarize some of the problems of the General Assembly. In addition, the “Freedom from Want” and “Freedom to Live in Dignity” sections summarize many contemporary issues related to human rights.

This document lays out the purposes and procedures of the UN. Delegates should be familiar with this document, especially Chapter IV, which addresses the GA.

This press release summarizes a Fall 2013 GA Plenary debate on resolutions initiated by the GA-3. Search for your country’s name to see what position it has taken on recent social, cultural, and humanitarian issues.

---

Human Rights Watch. Website. Available at http://www.hrw.org. This non-governmental organization is an excellent source for human rights news and analysis, as well as special reports on specific countries and issues.

United Nations. “The General Assembly of the United Nations.” Available from http://www.un.org/ga. This is the official website of the General Assembly. It is the best place to start for information on the General Assembly’s actions and duties, as well as the agendas and resolutions of its various committees.

United Nations. “General Assembly Third Committee.” Available at http://www.un.org/ga/third/index.shtml. This is the official website of the GA-3. It provides access to the GA-3’s current draft resolutions and reports. For GA-3 resolutions and meetings from last year, see the source described above in footnote 23.

United Nations. “Member States.” http://www.un.org/en/members/index.shtml This site provides access to each state’s UN mission website, where you can research your country’s position on the issues before the UN.

United Nations. “Millennium Development Goals Report 2014” Available from http://www.un.org/millenniumgoals/reports.shtml. This report uses graphs and photos to show the work that has been done to meet the MDGs in various countries and regions since 2000. It also provides suggestions for meeting the goals by 2015.

United Nations General Assembly. “Plenary Speeches.” Available at http://www.unol.org/gaspeeches.html From this site you can read or watch your country's speeches at high-level GA Plenaries. This will give you a sense of its policy priorities and diplomatic style.